

Figure 10.14 Hydrogen bonds in protein folding. In a folded protein structure, most hydrogen-bonding groups interact with other groups within the protein. When the protein unfolds, these groups interact with water instead. The difference in hydrogen-bonding energy between the two situations is close to zero, but the hydrogen bonds in the folded protein might have slightly lower energy if the groups are favorably oriented.

